Blu, the Florida-based device maker, has a robust portfolio of smartphones with a common look. All these phones share being their budget friendly nature. Continuing to add to its lineup, Blu unveiled two more affordable smartphones last month at CES 2016, with the cheapest of the already low-cost phones that is the Blu Vivo XL. Of course, very affordable devices have been the focus of many Android OEMs over the past year, so does Blu manage to stand out with its latest offering? We found out, in this comprehensive review of Blu Vivo XL! Design The VIVO XL is definitely one of the most flashy blue options to date, with a printed finish on the removable back cover, and gold is the color version of this particular revision unit. Whether you like it, the look is completely dependent on your personal opinion, and there is another subtle touch of color option available as well, but it has to be said that the shiny plastic backrest and the matt finish edges allow an excellent feel in the hand. However, the plastic back cover appears to be prone to scratches, so you may have to rely on a protective case to keep the device in a pristine condition. Fortunately, the VIVO XL comes with a case in the box. I take a look around the device, the power button and the Rocker volume are on the right side, and all the buttons offer a reasonable amount of tactile feedback. The capacitive navigation keys are located below the screen, but in a rather strange motion motion changed the positions of the back and the last application keys. This might take some getting used to depending on what device it's coming with. There is also a multicolor LED at the top left on the screen, and the connector Headphones and the USB type C port are up and at the bottom, respectively. Blu has also done a great job by keeping the bezels around the screen and the upper part and the lower slim chin, which makes a handling experience more manageable than your 5.5-inch screen suggest. I would suggest. The quality has not always been particularly good when it comes to devices that are in the sub-150 category, but that is also something that is slowly changing, especially with the live XL. Despite its plastic construction, the device certainly does not feel cheap, and the solid construction allows a great feeling while holding the telephone. Show the XL vivo comes with a 5.5-inch AMOLED screen with a 720p resolution, resulting in a pixel density of 267PPI. The pixel count may not be the highest by there, and although a higher resolution would have been good, 720p makes sense at this price, "the main advantages of the screen are clearly displayed in the Duration Department. of the battery duration. The screen experience is also really very good, with the AMOLED panel that allows a high contrast and high-contrast saturated colors. In general, the Visualization of the XL is certainly a Of the best we see in this price range, despite its younger resolution. Performance and hardware under the hole, the XL Vivo comes with an OCTA-Core Mediatek MT6753 MT6753 processor, was recorded at 1.3GHz and supported by the GPU Mali-T720 and 2GB RAM. The performance of the XL live has been good for the most part, with the handling tasks of the device with ease most of the time. However, there were some cases in which the telephone usually I would feel slow. Cially when opening or switching between applications through the Recent Apps screen. As regards the Games, the device is able to handle informal games without problems, but you will see some drops of pictures with more intensive games graphically. That said, the XL live is still a decent option for mobile players in a tight budget.16 Gigabytes is the only built-in storage option available with the XL live, but gets a Expandable through the microSD card up to 64GB to alleviate any questions. The device also comes with a standard suite of connectivity options, as well as double SIM capabilities. You get 4G full full LTE on the T-Mobile network, and almost full support at AT&T. We were able to test this revision unit on T-Mobile's extended range LTE network (band 12) and experienced excellent connectivity. However, if you're on AT&T, you might be missing LTE coverage in some rural areas, as the device lacks band 5 support. The best dual SIM Android phones availableBest The device's unique rear speaker offers a decent audio experience, but an increase in volume and a reduction in distortion would certainly have been appreciated. That said, it's still about average for the price, and you will definitely get the job done in most situations. BLU made the switch to USB Type-C with the Vivo XL, which is a very welcome move, but slightly inconvenient. Now you will have to remember to bring the charger if you need to recharge the battery on the go, but adopting the latest standard is certainly good to see, especially with an economical smartphone. The good news is that having to carry the charger may not be necessary at all, as the 3,150mAh unit of Vivo XL offers excellent battery life, with the help of the lower resolution display and the low power processing package. On average, the device would comfortably last a full day of use, if not more, with around 5.5 hours of screen time on, and that can also be extended up to 6 hours with slightly lighter usage. Of course, if battery life turns out to be a concern, the battery is removable, and you always have the option to bring a spare. Best Economy Phones You Can Buy NowThe BestCamera The BLU Vivo XL comes with a 13MP rear camera with auto-focus phase detection and a LED flash, along with a 5MP front unit. The camera works almost as expected from a device that is within the price range and quite well under optimal lighting conditions, resulting in very sharp images and in a lot of detail, as well as with a respectable amount of dynamic range. However, with notable notable on some images, occasional color reproduction errors, and low light capacities, this camera will certainly not surpass those found on more expensive smartphones. As for the application of the camera, the interface is quite simplistic, with ease of use being the focus here. However, there is a professional mode available, which allows more granular control over aspects such as ISO and shutter speed. There are also plenty of other modes and features built-in, but taking photos in the normal auto mode is most cases. Software On the software side, the BLU Vivo XL is running Android 5.1 Lollipops out of the box, with a custom skin on top. The software experience that BLU offers with its smartphones has been quite fragmented, but in the case of the Vivo XL there is a much improved and more polished iteration. Of course, basic Android features like a drawer of apps and lock screen notifications are missing, but the overall experience still feels much better than what you see with some other devices in the BLU portfolio.In other Android stock changes, the quick changes to the notification drop-down have also been eliminated completely, in favor of an Apple-style control center. Many of the system's UI elements are also sharp deviations from Android shares, which may be disappointing for some enthusiasts. There are some third party applications preinstalled as well, but all of them can be easily uninstalled. When it comes to software updates, BLU has been trying to do a better job by offering timely updates for its smartphones, but we'll have to wait and see if and when an official Android 6.0 Marshmallow update will be available for the Vivo XL. That said, if the execution of Latest versions of Android is important to you, BLU smartphones may not be the way to go anyway. The XL live can have its low-end processing problems, and mediocre camera. The device also gets a lot to the right, although, with more than more than compensation of low resolution, its excellent battery duration, and the fact that users will have access to 4G LTE networks in The USA, which are all great reasons to collect this affordable telephone. As mentioned, you can also take advantage of a sale after its launch, so if you have decided to buy this phone, now it would be the best time to do it. What are your thoughts?
