Far from American prototypes of a serial killer, Warren is more inspired by French serial stories, such as Mamada Traore, Patrick Treme or Guy Georges. At any time of the film, we see that stress related to danger is always distilled by the director by default to make him the main topic. This is particularly visible on the advertising disc, advising girls not to come out one night or the hero's absurd reaction to police sirens on the street. Warren will not show anything else. Always modest and significant, they do not show violence in front of the camera, the director prefers life scenes, not forgetting to cause discomfort, just like in the opening scene, in which Dier attracts the girls' attention on the train. The biggest strength of this movie is an acting game. Noomi Rapace and Aksel Hennie play well with their notes. All in all, a love of hate that you share.
