• Theories that can be either absolutist or relativist

• Utilitarianism

When Bentham came up with his hedonic calculus, he had developed a theory that allowed you to work out what was right or wrong in any given situation. Calculating might lead to the greatest happiness for the greatest number and yet lead to greater unhappiness in another situation. What is right or wrong is relative to the situation, it's whatever has the best consequences (teleological).

Mill and many others have adapted Bentham's 'act' utilitarianism, claiming that we need to make laws based on the principle of utility (the laws that lead to the greatest good) and then follow those laws. This means there is only one, for example, for the rule because it generally leads to greater happiness, even if in this case it will lead to more unhappiness.

It is developed because there are no exceptions to the rules (if you were allowed to break the rules, the would be act utilitarianism).
