Google Docs has officially thrown to open data ports, allowing users to back up all their documents to any chosen and compressed format in a zip file. It is a serious tranquility for those concerning the cloud. The feature seemed to arrive very recently without any official blog post or explanation, but seems to work more than a simple selected tester. The only connection for use is selecting all the files, as explains the Google operating system blog. The documents often "hide" (or fundamentally archive) I am not using frequently, so I just had to go to the "hidden" sight in the left view selector - those with more complex storage schemes should try the "all articles" view or an asterisk jolly search to pin what they want. Once you selected or searched for what you want to export, you will need to go to the end until all the documents are exposed, then press the check signals to select them all. Finally, right-click immediately in the selected documents, choose "Export" and tell Google How to export Word, Spreadsheet and PDF files. When insulating document data somewhere in addition to Google servers, take a peek with other free tools to back up online accounts ... you will feel a little less linked to the whims of various server administrators and security representatives Account. Three to seven years in residence and perhaps a scholarship from one to three years before becoming a certified on board. A lot of education goes to become - an entrepreneur? The answer is yes - at least for doctors who leave their practices to start a company. It seems a little crazy, giving up the prestige and income of being a doctor, but Laura Eackloff, 45, has never been happier. She was a podiatrist for 10 years and she really appreciated the treatment of patients, but she hated to spend more time on the phone you negotiate with health insurance companies that looking at her patients. "Honestly, health care is a business, and I didn't like the business of medicine," says Eackloff, who turned off the practice of her and opened Gotta Knit, a yarn shop in the Greenwich Village in New York. She of her friends and her family were extremely favorable to her to help people with their hands instead of their feet. Although Eackloff admits her father of her, who paid for most of the medical school, she was slightly shocked. "With the insurance companies I was always negotiating my tax," says Eackloff, explaining her reasoning to leave. "It was no longer a real paid bargain, at least from my perspective. But if I teach someone an hour of knitting, they know they are $ 50. It's not profitable as medicine. I'm not going to pretend that is. But it's much more rewarding. "For Dr. Maurice Ramirez, a former ER doctor who still occasionally practice medicine, the jump was not so big. Now it is the founder and the president of the consulting company High Alert, LLC, a consulting company based on the Florida Basata who deals with crisis management.ramirez founded himself exploring the idea of leaving the emergency room after taking The instructor program of the National Disaster Life Support and be called to help in the consequences of Hurricane Katrina. Realizing how devastating a disaster can, he created him company of him, which offers more than 30 different services in the preparation of disasters, including topics Like the right of disaster and how to treat medical victims after an accident that involves the ability to destroy mass.Transferring skills for any destruction. Doctors also think of making change, Ramirez says you don't forget any of the abilities that made them a good doctor. "The abilities that made patients love you and diseases fear - effective interview, rapid decision-making process, decision-making, Recognition - These are all the essential skills for the entrepreneur. And just like a good doctor, good entrepreneurs make referrals, get consultation and ask for help. "Philippa Kennealy, MD, MPC, CPCC, CPC, agrees that doctors have some advantages compared to entrepreneurs without the letters after their name. In reality, the family retired medical-spinning-business coach is now specialized in helping The doctors to become entrepreneurs, like his website, the MD entrepreneurial, attests. "They have an advantage in some areas," says Kennealy, "They have a powerful capacity of analysis, and even if it is a joke that I Doctors are not communicators, many are. They also have the ability to work independently and are able to be quite decisive, that once again, it is a precious competence. And I'm smart "but not all their skills are transferable, warns Ramirez. "Don't think that medical training - residence - is a good model for education training or learning to drive. As a survivor of residence, you are not different from a survivor abuse minors, and you are inclined to abuse those subordinates to you as a result. If you abuse them, lose them. "There are other obstacles to be a doctor-turn-business success, Kennealy says, including income adjustment." The idea that they have to go for a period of time with perhaps a negative salary, which can stall, "she says." Those who decide to do something entrepreneurial are really motivated, and have an incredible passion for what they are doing. ' Transfer of the Passionthat rightly describes Eackloff, who spent the last 18 months of his practical evening podology and work weekends in a yarn store, just to be absolutely sure that his next career move was the thing to do. Endally passionate of his business is Dr. Mark Allen, who left emergency medicine because he is hoping that his business can improve it.allen is the CEO of Corticon Technologies, which creates software to help simplify the decision-making process for A variety of industries - financial, government, manufacture, insurance and social medical decisions, for example as a. N Order should be managed, at the complex, as a turnover is recorded for a whole division, it can present The bottlenecks and legal issues, if not managed quickly and correctly. In a hospital, in particular, you do not want those small things that interfere with IPs The largest roblems of life and death. It turns out, only five percent of its customers are hospitals; Most industries that use California Company software are in the financial sector. After launching the business, Allen realized that hospitals were not yet ready for him. "Health service providers tend to spend a lot of money for those things that are reimbursed by insurance companies," he explains. "Hospital hospitals are absolutely behind in their IT systems than everyone else." But once Allen grows the activity of him, which has 50 employees, in a powerfully profitable platform for his investors, intends to focus on further philanthropic questions, how to bring his technology to the medical industry. He, of course, is the entrepreneurship. There are always surprises and unexpected paths to travel. For example, Eackloff has never expected that one of him's first and best customers, Goldie Axelrod, 56, would end up buying shirt and become a partner. The fact that you are coveredly a nurse is so much more ironic. But the biggest surprise for Eackloff is that it is at all in the knitwear business. "When I finished the school of medicine, I wanted to do something for myself and learn to work Shirt," says Eackloff. "I finally wanted to learn something about the pure fun, instead of learning something that would help me with my career ".
